Table 1 shows an example of functional health impairment areas in neck cancer that should be analyzed by OTs [20]. It is known that due to these side effects, there is a decrease especially in the physical functions, daily activities of life ADL and quality of life in clients with cancer [9]. Any strategies for fatigue management recommended by occupational therapists must take into account the physical, psychological, cognitive and social dimensions of fatigue.

It is clear from this that cancer-related fatigue can have diverse and profound effects. Cortico-steroids are prescribed initially until more definite treatment such as surgical decompression can be instituted.
