He argues, radically for his times, that political authority and obligation are based on the individual self-interests of members of society who are understood to be equal to one another, with no single individual invested with any essential authority to rule over the rest, while at the same time maintaining the conservative position that the monarch, which he called the Sovereign, must be ceded absolute authority if society is to survive. Even though he supported the monarchy as the Social Contract government, his philosophy clearly establishes the right of the monarch on the grounds of reasoned Social Contract, rather than divine right. Morals by Agreement.
